Green EDITORIAL EXCERPT How must it feel to be highly intelligent, but unable to demonstrate that intelligence because of concomitant attributes that provide obstacles to optimum use of that intelligence? I can only imagine the frustration and even despair that children must feel in this circumstance. To know that you can easily figure things out in your mind and yet appear as less than able to classmates and adults has to grind down ones self confidence and eagerness to learn. We have focused on the topic of twice-exceptional learners (2e) several times in the past those learners who are gifted, but have one or more learning deficits as well. However, because they are some of the least well understood and most underserved in our gifted population, it is imperative that we keep coming back with important and new information to help serve them.
